Q: Is it possible to use WCF Services without the benefit of a WCF Service Host? Is it possible to use WCF Services without the benefit of a WCF Service Host?. A: It sure is possible. Look at the New SVC project in Visual Studio, it's where you create a service that isn't bound to an endpoints. Just add the ServiceContract and DataContract attributes to the class declaration, and then use the methods and properties of that class. [ServiceContract] public interface IMyService { [OperationContract] string GetName(); [OperationContract] string GetAddress(); } You can then use that class to send and receive messages. IMyService service = new MyService(); // call the operation string result = service.GetName(); A: Yes, of course you can. In the case of WCF, normally the host is an appdomain, whereas the service is hosted in a specific type of service. This can be done with ASP.NET by inheriting a class from System.ServiceModel.ServiceHost and overriding the protected virtual Start method. This will become a host, and you can define your operation contracts and operations in the derived class. However, there are reasons why you might want a host, and this will be explained in a moment. The Web API is a great alternate, as it provides the capability to integrate the WCF service models with ASP.NET MVC models, without too much of the fuss and bother of WCF. You may want to look at that route - it's easy to get started and has an excellent community behind it. The fact that your question relates to "WCF Services" is unfortunate, as this doesn't really pertain to WCF, but a general topic that is commonly associated with WCF. The Trump administration has been working for months to have congressional approval of an Iran deal renegotiation. And the current bill allows for the current deal to be terminated if five countries in the 2015 deal agree to renegotiate before July 1, 2018. Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif on Tuesday tweeted that if President Donald Trump decides to withdraw from the
