This paper presents the results of a study of the spatial and temporal distribution of malaria in the province of Santa Fe, Argentina, during the years 2000-2005. The analysis was carried out by using the Malaria Atlas Project, with the difference that the basis used for the spatial analysis was the degree of malaria incidence, expressed as the number of symptomatic cases for the period 2000-2005, rather than the number of cases acquired by positivity in the past. The results obtained show the persistence of the macro-epidemics in the province, accentuated in the last two years with the acceleration of the increase of the disease in some municipalities. In turn, the parasite transmission processes show a characteristic spatial and temporal concentration of the endemicity. Description Up to 50% of sperm count can be recovered with proper treatment.
