You can think of the Network Management Console (NMC) as that mainframe's command line. It gives each node on the network access to a command-like interface to the HANA system in order to change or manipulate various settings on the system, like the credentials of a user, the IP address of the system, the services and applications deployed on the system, etc. Most importantly, the NMC helps create a mapping of all the nodes on the network to the servers, which is known as the Network Mapping Service. This service is often confusing for users that are not familiar with mainframes, because the process involves changing a lot of parameters on the system in order to map a specific node. Many of these operations are time consuming, some of them require expensive software licenses for the services, and some of them
