Fair Strike is the name of a US research initiative, the precursor to, and one of the successors to, Defense Science Board (DSB) work initiated by the office of the Secretary of Defense during the George W. Bush administration (typically referred to as the "Rumsfeld Era"). The focus of the Fair Strike concept was an "Industrial peace" approach toward regional security problems, stressed in a paper published by the National Security Archive in October 2004. The top focus of Fair Strike was to "dismantle the ties that bind warring peoples, places and cultures," to use the language of the DSB 2004 plan. Fair Strike was primarily an effort to consider a new definition for a range of issues of "tradition", and as such did not speak to unilateralism or a different concept of American foreign policy. Fair Strike offered early perspectives on transnational threats and on the next steps for dealing with terrorism and other problems. Fair Strike's major differences from prior thinking and planning dealt with how to achieve "regional security." Fair Strike was an early attempt to address the "war-winning" approach to "paradox" of problems, including nuclear and chemical/biological/radiological/nuclear (CBRN) problems. The belief of the Fair Strike team was that a major security problem was not a problem created by one country, but a problem that starts from a "tradition" of war and violation of human rights. The Fair Strike program emphasized small-scale actions, and did not focus on the evaluation of large-scale actions such as the use of nuclear weapons in war situations. Context During the first Bush administration (the first nine-month term - a July 1989-January 1993 term), there was a sense that the fundamental "tradition" of war and violation of the human rights remained unchanged for the significant majority of the world's people. In some cases, there was an attempt to "break the American cycle of war" (a phrase often used by Undersecretary of Defense Planning under the Rumsfeld administration), and to work with regimes where there were existing working regimes. This was a part of the rejuvenation of CPD activities under the Bush administration. In other cases, there was an attempt to visit change in "culture" between peoples, and to change the "traditions" of war that were of greatest concern. As changes were made in the Middle East, there was an
