When a local farmer, Kan-Chan, tells her of the legend of the four Goddess sisters, Amaterasu, Kan-Mana, Kan-Yatau and Kan-Imiti, who, centuries ago, rebelled against Amaterasu for their god was everything to them, and although vanquished, the Goddesses are believed to still live on in a sacred valley far to the north. Hanomame follows Kan-Chan's advice, buys a pair of expensive, 4-inch gold-and-brown snakes, and sets off on her journey on a path to find the sacred valley. was developed a few months ago to showcase the technology that will power the Guns for Glory setup for the Innovate UK Tech Awards which are being held this year by Tech Nation. Guns for Glory is the first VR competition of its kind - as far as I am aware - where people can be immersed in the characters' first person view, work out how they use their haptic tracking device and pull the trigger. The guns are VR-ready thanks to a custom augmented reality app coming soon to Microsoft Windows and Android. The Tech Nation Awards will also see VR pioneers Vrse and Gunfire Interactive showcasing their own technology. We wanted to showcase VR tech for the general public and VR is something that we have been experimenting with a lot in the office. So during the brief time of GunsBox, we grabbed the chance to try out each VR device on offer and see what this technology looks like when used for the first time. The Teslas, HTC Vive and the Oculus Rift all worked well and the MS Surface Headset which uses a combination of "sphere tracking" and head tracking did a better job tracking the motions of the ballistics.

Where does the Go device stand? Unlike the other virtual reality headsets, the Go does not require the use of complex a positioning system. The Go actually powers itself using the position of the devices defined by hand motions. Backing from head tracking with it's two cameras and cross calibration to the phone on the users device. As a rough idea, the Go is tracking the 3D motion with a deviation of about 28° (head tracking) on a line that starts from the index finger tip to the centre of the pupils through which the light is emitted (sphere tracking). The system inside the Go has a double LIDAR ranging sensor, a camera and computing unit which is also looking at a white object. This allows for circle and iso motion, 360° rotation and distance. The final evaluation was done by using the phone's head tracking and have it emulate the go system. Placing the phone in a go headset causes the phones head tracker to indicate a 3D position, which the go looks for, calibrating the orientation of the phone and placing it's orientation in the virtual sphere. Now for hand tracking, the go uses the phones camera to determine the fingers position. The phone's camera can also detect whether the finger is flexed or not, if the

"The Manse on Soracca" is an episodic voxel-based exploration game developed in collaboration with interactive games company Versus Evil. In this game, the player searches in the manse of Mr. Jaspers, an old and eccentric collector from an unknown and distant past, with the help of a new and surprisingly well-trained sidekick, Master R'luhn. The game presents an atmosphere of another era through its soundtrack and visual design, but it is a deeply surprising experience nonetheless. Written by: Marco Meneghini, Creative Director "The Manse on Soracca" is available at digital retailers everywhere now. "The Manse on Soracca" is also available for the following platforms: PC, Mac, Linux, PlayStation 4, Xbox One, and PlayStation Vita. Bio Black Mesa and its community are mourning the death of Gordon Freeman. He was the protagonist of Half-Life, a character developed by Valve and regarded as one of the most important characters in gaming history. In the game, Freeman was a co-operative shooter with a weak protagonist. The villain's name was Dr. Breen. The story of the game is divided into three episodes: Episode 1 - Black Mesa, Episode 2 - Blue Shift, and Episode 3 - The Death of Freeman, by the way. Final Half-Life is a third-person shooter that, like its sister game Half-Life 2, involves a plot where a man, Gordon Freeman, rescues another man, Alyx Vance, from the G-Man, a hostile creature that resembles a human and attacks its victims with a weapon from which it can suck the blood from its victims. The G-Man's new secret location is on the Roswell Naval Weapons Station, a military base in Roswell, New Mexico. A mining ship is moving from the G-Man's central station when it explodes, killing the G-Man and changing a U.S. Army helicopter into a flying metal monster. Alyx and Gordon free the helicopter from the G-Man and escape. The G-Man reappears in Blue Shift. The G-Man recognizes Gordon, and forces Alyx to kill him. Gordon saves her from the G-Man, and Alyx rejects him. After that, Gordon is possessed by the G-Man and destroys the G-Man in the last episode of Half-Life. A game released in late 2004, Crysis, was created by Crytek GmbH, a German

I figured I would go ahead and get this started while I can actually some graphics. Did not expect this game to be so popular! Looking at and the other Japanese "tribute" pinball tables like Taisen I am by it was at least slightly successful and will be looking forward to future of "tribute" pinball.
