“We got a tremendous response to ‘History of FIFA’ and the physical and tactical layers of FIFA 22, but we’re still looking for feedback from the community,” said JC Frawley, Senior Producer on FIFA 22, via EA Sports blog. “We’ve just rolled out ‘HyperMotion Technology’ to the public for the first time, and you can experience and share your feedback to help shape FIFA 22. We’re continuing to listen and take on all the feedback we receive, and hope you’ll try out ‘HyperMotion Technology’ as well as ‘History of FIFA’ to help us deliver FIFA 22.” “HyperMotion Technology” is at the core of the new gameplay experience in FIFA 22. Key elements include: “Bio-Dynamics” Crosses through the air, as well as tackles and passes in-game, are much more realistic and dynamic, with improved ball physics. “Build-Up Ball” Ball dribbles are more fluid and natural; accelerations and stops are more realistic. “Striker’s Zone” Added to the player’s goal threat, and used to create more realistic pressure on defences. “Goalkeeper’s Ball” Visual cues in the game are now scaled to match the player’s size, so that the goalkeeper can interact more naturally with the ball. “Speed on the Ball” Fewer sequences of player collisions, and more realistic acceleration and deceleration when the ball makes contact. “First Touch Control” Improved control over first touches is applied to a wider range of actions on the ball, and players respond more dynamically and realistically to challenges. “Zones in Motion” By colour-coding areas where players move freely and areas where the ball can be played, you can build more natural paths on the pitch for players to move in or out. “Impact Engine” Players defend, pass and attack more realistically, with the ball now naturally absorbing and deflecting contact from the surface. “Sprint” Passing is now much faster, and defenders are less likely to get caught with the ball because players can pull
