Results after intrarectal infusion of contrast agent in 125 patients with benign diseases and in 37 with ulcerative colitis]. For example, in cases of colitis, endoscopy can only demonstrate the extension of the affection. In our own previous experimental work, we discovered that contrast medium injected into the rectum can be reliably passed into the large intestine. During the period from October 1990 to December 1994, 125 patients with various benign colic alterations (n = 65) or colitis (n = 60) were given a contrast medium (70% of them barium sulfate) by means of an enema, i.e. retrogradely. The therapeutic effect on the colon was assessed by means of an infrared videoendoscope. The findings were checked in a blind manner. Independent of the diagnosis, in 50 cases, the early aspiration was successful. In the further analysis, in 56% the barium sulfate as well as in 68% the methylene blue were passed into the colon. Both agents are useful for the demonstration of stenoses and for the examination of the inflammatory stenosis. In 12 cases, especially in colitis, dye was passed into the small bowel and in one case into the stomach. The interest
