MiniTool Partition Wizard Professional Edition 18.12.4 Crack Serial KeyQ: php program which can crawl a webpage and update its database I have a website which gets updated after every 15 minutes. Now i want to write a php program which can crawl that page and submit the new data to my server. please help Thanks A: Simplest way is using this class: Basically you can just get the contents of the page, replace things, and save back to the server. Q: Why does Linux have functions like memcpy and memcmp while Windows does not? I know that Linux doesn't have the memcpy function. Why is that? I understand that if I wanted to copy from a buffer to a region of memory in Windows, I would need to write a loop, but what's the function for doing that in Linux? A: In C, on Unix-like systems (including Linux), memcpy is implemented as memmove, which has a simpler implementation, not just because of portability issues, but also because memcpy is not required by the standard. From the memmove() manpage: The memmove() function copies nmemb elements from the object pointed to by src to the object pointed to by dest. It is equivalent to (while copying byte by byte) a loop of: dest = src + nmemb * (dest - src); I mention this, because if you are writing a portable program, you should not use memcpy or memcmp. All systems have a memcpy, but most do not have memcmp. As a result, you will have to write the standard memcmp() function if you want a portable program. A: Linux no longer uses memcpy. If you want memcpy, the function is called msync() on Linux. (1) Technical Field
