The European Union voted on May 25 to take further steps to phase out the infamous practice of using phthalates in children's toys. The substances were discovered in 2011 to cause reproductive and developmental toxicity in laboratory animals, but were never banned. A committee of the European Food Safety Authority (EFSA) has instead advised that toy phthalates be listed on the EU's so-called "Florence List," a non-mandatory component of the EU market protection program that includes substances posing a high health risk to humans. Researchers at the French National Institute of Health and Medical Research (INSERM) revealed in 2011 that the air or dust in toy stores had phthalates in it. Phthalates are used in manufacturing plastic materials and used in pesticides and products such as perfumes and personal care products. The report sparked a group of four European regulators to set up a committee (MDG4) of experts to evaluate the possible endocrine disrupting effects of phthalates on children under the age of three. This assessment was implemented in 2011, with the assessment period extending until May 28, 2015. The committee is an independent body composed of experts appointed by the European Food Safety Authority (EFSA), the European Chemicals Agency (ECHA) and the European Medicines Agency (EMA), and is responsible for the listing and labelling of substances intended for use by children under the age of three. The new ruling directs the body that issues the listing to evaluate the scientific evidence on the specific endocrine-disrupting effects of phthalates in children and to assess the relevance of the potential risks for that age group. They must also establish a methodology for the use of phthalates in children's products. These requirements are linked to the certification of toy products and to toys for very young children under 3. The committee has a maximum of 15 experts who are no more than 10 years older than the targeted population. The manufacturers have three months to provide all the necessary information and evidence for the committee to consider the matter. According to the Committee's recommendations, phthalates be listed on the Florence List for children under the age of 6d1f23a050
